December 2011

Leaves in the Wind

David Schelhaas

Dordt College

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcollections.dordt.edu/pro_rege

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Available at: https://digitalcollections.dordt.edu/pro_rege/vol40/iss2/7

This Poetry is brought to you for free and open access by the University Publications at Digital Collections @ Dordt. It has been accepted for inclusion in Pro Rege by an authorized administrator of Digital Collections @ Dordt. For more information, please contact ingrid.mulder@dordt.edu.
Leaves in the Wind

David Schelhaas

Dark linden leaves flutter on the umber couch in my study, shadows cast by the morning sun. Sunbeams draw my eyes outward to the tree where only a few leaves still hang and into the blue sky beyond, where God sits, somewhere, laughing, perhaps, or puzzled, as he deals out rain and wind and snow around the globe. Here he’s spreading out buttery sunshine—and leaves, of course, which are raining down everywhere after last night’s frost. Weather, war, the starving hoards, he must get tired of deciding things. And all those prayers that fly at him like leaves in the wind, words, words, words in a thousand different languages, some confident and faith full, some doubt full and timid as shy boys at a dance. How does he do it? Does he grab one here and there to answer and let the rest float on by? Oh, I know what the Book says but it is not always enough. The evidence of things seen beggars glib conclusion.

Do you think you know God? That you can go after him like a big game hunter, net him with large Latin words—omnipotent, omnipresent, omniscient—and cage him in a catechism?

I sit here all day fiddling with words, trying to put them into some sort of tune, an arrangement that harmonizes God, the world and my question-cluttered mind. To what end? Better to go outside and rake my leaf-littered lawn.