10-2011

Putting a Face on the Facts

Mark Volkers
Dordt College, mark.volkers@dordt.edu

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcollections.dordt.edu/faculty_work

Part of the Film Production Commons

Recommended Citation
http://digitalcollections.dordt.edu/faculty_work/9

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by Digital Collections @ Dordt. It has been accepted for inclusion in Faculty Work: Comprehensive List by an authorized administrator of Digital Collections @ Dordt. For more information, please contact ingrid.mulder@dordt.edu.
Putting a Face on the Facts

Abstract
Dordt College film professor and students work on a documentary on people living in poverty. It's called “The Fourth World”.

Keywords
poverty, film, documentary

Disciplines
Film and Media Studies | Film Production

Comments

This article is available at Digital Collections @ Dordt: http://digitalcollections.dordt.edu/faculty_work/9
Tuned In

IN MY EXPERIENCE, reading statistics about poverty has a unique effect on people. It creates a slight rise in blood pressure as people read about “1 billion living in slums,” but then the effect dissipates as the enormity of that number—1 billion—seeps in. “I don’t know any of those people. It’s just a statistic, just a number,” we seem to tell ourselves.

Wrapping our brains around some of the huge issues of the day is a struggle, especially when those issues are given to us in print. But what if we stripped away the glaze of statistics and got more visceral, more real, more personal?

That’s what some of my students and I have tried to do in making The Fourth World, a documentary produced by Prairie Grass Productions of Dordt College. We filmed individual slum dwellers in Guatemala City, Manila, Nairobi, Mumbai, and Managua to help tell the stories of the “1 billion” people we sometimes hear about.

In Manila we spent a week with a family who lives under a bridge near a garbage dump. They are José and Elvie Alquino, and their oldest daughter, Jovelyn, wants to be a nurse. In Nairobi, we filmed Felix, a 16-year-old boy who works eight hours a day for 17.5 cents an hour. In Guatemala City, Tanya begs at a busy intersection. Her story forever changed the film crew’s attitude towards beggars.

It’s almost impossible for filmmakers—students or not—to come away from such experiences without being deeply moved. People who live in slums have names, dreams, aspirations, and personalities—just like we do. Working with Christian organizations in the areas where we filmed, we were able to zero in on individuals, not statistics.

Paraphrasing Chaim Potok, “the universal is made known in the specific.” Documentaries can do an excellent job of telling specific stories to help us understand the macro-story.

People who live in slums have names, dreams, aspirations, and personalities.

Mark Volkers is the digital media production instructor at Dordt College in Sioux Center, Iowa. The Fourth World is in post-production. For more information, go to slumdoc.com or visit the “Slum Documentary Film Project” Facebook page.

THE LOWDOWN

More documentaries that will open your eyes.

Born into Brothels: A photographer gives cameras to children of brothel workers to help them document their lives and express themselves. (Think Film)

Reparando: Ministry in “La Limonada,” an enormous slum in Guatemala City, brings healing to people who had given up hope. (Athentikos)

Emmanuel’s Gift: A young man in Ghana with a deformed leg bikes around the country to help raise awareness and build relationships in a culture that ostracizes those with disabilities. (First Look Pictures)

Waste Land: An artist leads an art project using materials salvaged from a landfill in Brazil. See a fuller review at thebanner.org. (New Video Group)