AT THE TABLE: AN EDUCATION IN GIVING

As a child, one of my very first introductions to giving, in addition to the offering plate, was the image of my parents sitting down at the kitchen table once the dishes had been cleared and my sister and I were off to bed. For one evening at the end of each month, my parents would sit with a calculator, a stack of envelopes, and their checkbook. They would look over their budget for the month, pay their bills, then proceed to open each and every letter they had received from missionaries, various organizations, churches, and schools asking for support.

I can still picture the two of them sitting there, reading many of the letters out loud, reviewing if and what they had given in the past and conferring about the timing and need of the current request. Giving was a given. It was as routine as paying the bills and as consistent as the calendar. It was never preceded with a qualifier or accompanied by a complaint. And despite the frequency and sheer volume of requests they received, it was never tedious.

My husband and I now sit at our kitchen table with our own four children watching and listening. Occasionally, they ask questions. Where does our money go the most? Why do we cover silage piles for Christian Education? And most recently upon my return from Wal-Mart, How much money did you waste?

As Dordt's director of annual giving, I am now the one asking. For many Dordt College students, a gift to the annual fund serves to make a Christ-centered education not only a possibility, but a reality. I'm responsible for telling their stories. I'm responsible for ensuring that there's a letter on your table and an email in your inbox. It is my job to cultivate giving.

In hindsight, my parents did not intentionally set out to model stewardship, tithing, or even philanthropy through their practice of "month ends." And in all honesty, I know there were times when there was very little left at the end of each month to give. My parents' example was simply the grace-filled byproduct of trust and faithfulness lived out once a month around the kitchen table.
