Because I Want to Know God's Will

Rose Postma

for my life, I decide to buy a Leicester Long Wool sheep, shave its coat, card the fibers into a cloud, leave it on my lawn to see what the dew will do. This acting as Gideon is dangerous like dismantling sunlight and separating it into piles by color and hue like my brother did as a child: taking apart clocks and radios to understand how they worked, chimed the hour, broadcast the news. But unlike him, I am afraid that once all the screws have been loosed, bolts unwound, toggles released, I will be unable to gather the light and reassemble it in the shape of early January sun.

So take the yarn instead between your fingers, cast a row of stitches on a thin, cold needle and pray the pattern will be revealed as each row drops.
