
Pro Rege

Volume 50
Number 2 Fine Arts Issue

Article 10

December 2021

Decomposition

Rose Postma
Dordt University, rose.postma@dordt.edu

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcollections.dordt.edu/pro_rege

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Postma, Rose (2021) "Decomposition," Pro Rege: Vol. 50: No. 2, 11.

Available at: https://digitalcollections.dordt.edu/pro_rege/vol50/iss2/10

This Poetry is brought to you for free and open access by the University Publications at Dordt Digital Collections. It has been accepted for inclusion in Pro Rege by an authorized administrator of Dordt Digital Collections. For more information, please contact ingrid.mulder@dordt.edu.

Decomposition

Rose Postma

This is not our first winter living on the edge of things: once we lived right outside a small town in South Dakota where we could see the streetlights but were cut off from town by a set of train tracks, and at night the train came howling off the prairie and back out again.
This winter there is no train just a highway with semis furiously down shifting as they pass the house before they enter town. We save carrot peelings, apple cores, coffee grounds in plastic containers on the counter—after dinner I stumble through snow drifts to the cornfield's edge and fling the compost as far as I can. I wonder when spring comes how much will be left, how much scavenged by birds, how much already soil supporting new growth. Also, every night in bed under the east facing window I wonder how much of us will be left in spring, how much will have been carried away, how much will have decomposed and started to live again.

Invocation

Rose Postma

I cannot be myself with you inside, wedged between breast bone and pelvis. I am vessel, harbor, new wineskin, and bringer of first light. Never alone in a darkened room, the mark of every secret touch splayed across my body. You will give birth to me even as you wrench me apart. So wring my womb limp, descend like molten lava leaving me empty, all hot blood drained. Split me apart, stitch my ragged edges closed, and I shall be new even as from my breast you siphon the last sips of self.