December 2010

Emotion Recollected in Tranquility

Howard Schaap

Dordt College, howard.schaap@dordt.edu

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcollections.dordt.edu/pro_rege

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Available at: https://digitalcollections.dordt.edu/pro_rege/vol39/iss2/5
“Poetry is the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings: it takes its origin from emotion recollected in tranquility.”
—William Wordsworth

My son insists I nap with him winter afternoons, on the floor, next to the Christmas tree and perpendicular to the couch. We lie, a mirrored pair, our eyes closed to slits but not minds— or not his mind.

Unbeknownst to me as I drift into the dull screen of sleep and wait for the rash images of inchoate dreams, his mind reels with waking visions. He giggles, the rapid fire chirrup of a squirrel.

My eyes open to daylight but his remain closed tight, watching the screen of his mind. The squirrel chirrups again.

“What’s so funny?” I ask. “The puppy dressed up as Santa,” he says, eyes still closed to finish out the vision, then giggles a brook into our living room.

This is Wordsworth’s child, in vacant or in pensive mood; the scene that flashes on his inward eye—the bliss of solitude—is a cartoon: “Snoopy dressed up as Santa,” he giggles again and the stream bubbles out of our house and across the snow, thawing the bleak December, the heft of winter afternoons, and my heart dances with the reckless abandon of Snoopy.