December 2007

Canto

Mary Dengler
Dordt College, mary.dengler@dordt.edu

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcollections.dordt.edu/pro_rege

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: http://digitalcollections.dordt.edu/pro_rege/vol36/iss2/16

This Poetry is brought to you for free and open access by the College Publications at Digital Collections @ Dordt. It has been accepted for inclusion in Pro Rege by an authorized administrator of Digital Collections @ Dordt. For more information, please contact ingrid.mulder@dordt.edu.
Mary Dengler

Liquid songs of one dark bird —A “Swallow,” someone said—Seeped through last summer’s wall of sleep as did his parent’s songs last year.
Having left his mate beneath my porch eaves on her nest,
He found a more transcendent spot Atop my chimney where,
from night to dawn, he sang a cycle, five or six repeated songs, at first against a deep-blue sea of sky made darker by a slip of silver moon and intermittent jets of light, but then against a powder-blue before the waves of cloud washed in to bathe, in morning gray, the trees and end the song an hour or two.

So different from the daytime scolds of harried adult—fringing from his nest of striving young, whose constant hold compels the father, raging, to the local trees for food—these night-long songs seemed broodings of a mind at peace, his sleeping young replete, his struggling mate done in,
his throated efforts tuned to soothe a sleeping house.
Compelled to sing, he traded hours of sleep for songs painlessly composed.
And what about the listener?
My chimney like an organ pipe produced such blasts outrageous in the dark, it seemed an angel and his muse had lighted just to deconstruct my sense of day and night, propriety and slight.
Like D.H. Lawrence honored by “The Snake,” I smiled at this display unorthodox, awake against the edge of sleep.

Next morning, after three short weeks, the family decamped
with forced fluttering, clean sweep, except for one smashed egg. Impatient of their weak-beaked young, they left, untroubled by this tragic loss, a ravaged nest behind, their heartless canto fading in the wind.
And did I sleep or dream? Keats might have asked.
I neither did but felt the pull of God’s economy—
The lull of song against the stress of rest.