
Pro Rege

Volume 34
Number 2 Fine Arts Issue 2005

Article 2

December 2005

Hurricane Litter: A Eulogy

Mary Dengler
Dordt College, mary.dengler@dordt.edu

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcollections.dordt.edu/pro_rege

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Dengler, Mary (2005) "Hurricane Litter: A Eulogy," Pro Rege: Vol. 34: No. 2, 4 - 5.

Available at: https://digitalcollections.dordt.edu/pro_rege/vol34/iss2/2

This Poetry is brought to you for free and open access by the University Publications at Digital Collections @ Dordt. It has been accepted for inclusion in Pro Rege by an authorized administrator of Digital Collections @ Dordt. For more information, please contact ingrid.mulder@dordt.edu.

Hurricane Litter: A Eulogy

Mary Dengler

A tattered leaf bag lying on the road, discarded trash, its flapping corners whispering mysterious burdens
to a thousand shuffling feet—their own sadness heavier than floods—remains a fortnight undisturbed.

A finger slipping through a tear evokes the ceiling truth of Michelangelo—connects its decomposing pointer to the mind of God and passers, lookers-on,
and elevates to realms of light its rotting sod.

A pair of feet emerging helpless, worn—in parody of breach-birth death from standing helpless when he couldn't use his head—could not sustain their walker from Canal Street
to another sense of place.

I see him totter his first steps, or led,
toward arms outstretched and sparkling eyes,
like Ponchetrain mid-day, to laugh at God's reflection in a pool, then see him walking youthfully toward school, where limitations meet and tie him in to words, not pushing him beyond the mirrors of the lake but stopping his reflection on a cloudy, lost, or struggling prince of tides in Others' eyes.

How far did adult footsteps take him from the truth—
did isolation rob him blind or poverty distort God's image with its lies?
Or had his feet slowed down to push a broom, or had those feet grown quick to run with criminal intent and other fools toward drugs to satisfy a starving soul?
Or had they carried music like a quiet flame from bar—with dignity and power—to bar to make the listeners whole?
Or did he dream inventions to the wind Divinci-like—an Archimedes Screw and helicopter plan—that might have saved his land?
Or had they merely wandered aimless from familiar hosts in anger, like Beloved's ghosts?

When Hurricane Katrina took the levies down 2005, those tired, quick, lost, or rhythmic feet, too poor to claim a credit card, a car, too proud or wise to shelter in the Dome, took an unaccustomed journey to a higher ground.
No plane or bus slowed down to chair the aging bearer of a pre-ordained, unchosen life.

Exhausted, first he sat, then crept a ways,
then slept,
abandoned on the crowded road until his finger met a corresponding Touch whose magnate draws the nameless from their concrete bed to work in heaven's throbbing gate and gives them back their name and place, erased
in walking through this waterworld.