Grounded

Bill Elgersma

Dordt College, bill.elgersma@dordt.edu

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcollections.dordt.edu/pro_rege

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://digitalcollections.dordt.edu/pro_rege/vol34/iss2/25 Grounded

Bill Elgersma

Somewhere,
in the middle of taking off and landing,
arriving and departing,
I have stopped.

The wind still blows
but the land does not move.
The earth spins
but nothing falls off.
My mind tumbles
but my head is fixed.

The flux so proudly borne
a semi-solid of change to ideas and circumstance, issue and personality
is hardening.
Bald guys and dead women frame concepts
establish roots in my vision while landscape and temperature temper decisions.

Time was
when ideologies
like new barns,
fresh fences, young groves were neat and strong and organized, saw futures, planned lives.
Now
weathered, leaning,
worn by relentless encounters on this wind-swept plain,
too busy, too middle-aged to straighten.
Content to patch and make do,
I prop and wire and nail but not construct.

And I wonder,
like the builders of the ramshackle homesteads too far from town to be inhabited, when it is time to abandon,
And move in.